Fed turns hawkish

Summary

The S&P500 stock index rose 1.6% and the USD and Treasury yields were little changed after the Fed signalled a faster pace of stimulus withdrawal amid rising inflation.

The Fed plans to end bond purchases in Q1, instead of June, and hike rates 3 times next year. The proposed rate hikes are faster than we had anticipated. A peak in inflation and changes in the Fed Board next year could slow that pace.

Positive market reaction suggests faster pace of stimulus withdrawal factored in. Fed Chair Powell had signalled a faster pace of bond purchase tapering going into the meeting.

We remain positive on risk assets. History shows equities and other risk assets outperform government bonds as long as growth remains buoyant and until policy rates turn restrictive. We expect US economic growth to remain above its pre-pandemic trend and inflation-adjusted policy rates to stay accommodative for the next 12 months.

Background

A more hawkish Fed comes against the backdrop of above-trend economic growth, which has helped lower the jobless rate to 4.2% (versus the Fed's target unemployment rate of 4%). The Fed upgraded its economic growth estimates for 2022 to 4%, which implies job market is likely to get tighter unless labour participation rebounds. A tighter job market typically leads to increased wage and inflation pressures.

The Fed is clearly concerned that inflation is likely to be less transitory and more persistent in the coming months. In its latest projections, the Fed raised its forecast for core inflation (based on the personal consumption expenditure price index) to 2.7% and 2.3% for 2022 and 2023, from 2.3% and 2.2% forecast in September. The new forecasts came in after data showed core consumer inflation (measured by a slightly different index) rose to a 30-year high of 4.9% and core producer price inflation rose to a record high of 7.7%.

Against the backdrop of above-trend growth and rising inflation, the Fed expects a faster pace of rate hikes in the coming years – it sees three 25bps rate hikes each in 2022 and 2023, followed by two more in 2024.

What does this mean for investors?

The positive market reaction suggests investors had factored in a hawkish Fed meeting. The consensus was expecting the Fed to double the pace of bond purchase tapering to USD 30bn a month after Fed Chair Powell told the US Congress that Fed policymakers would consider withdrawing stimulus at a faster pace. The new projection of three 25bps rate hikes by end-2022 (vs. earlier projection of less than one hike) also matches market estimates. Thus, the Fed has only caught up with the markets.

Bond purchase tapering does not mean rate hikes are imminent. While the accelerated pace of tapering suggests the Fed will end bond purchases in Q1, it means the Fed is creating more policy flexibility depending on how inflation evolves. We believe there is good chance that the Fed may dial down its rate projections once three new Fed members, to be nominated by President Biden, join the Board next year. The bond market (chart) is signalling it is more concerned about growth than inflation. We expect US inflation to peak in H1 next year as demand for goods wane and more workers return to jobs as pandemic stimulus savings are exhausted and vaccinations lift public confidence. An expected US fiscal tightening, combined with the lagged effects of a strong USD and China's slowdown, are also likely to impart disinflationary pressures on US prices by H2. This would offer the Fed the option to go slow on rate hikes after ending bond purchases.

Equities outperform bonds until policy turns restrictive. As the chart shows, equities typically continue to deliver strong returns in the lead up to rate hikes and for several months after the first rate hike as monetary policy is usually tightened against the backdrop of robust economic and earnings growth. We expect another year of strong corporate earnings on the back of above-trend US growth in 2022. Also, the Fed's policy rate is likely to remain well below inflation for at least the next 12 months, keeping financial conditions extremely accommodative.

The above factors suggest any ensuing market volatility is likely to create opportunities to add to our preferred risk assets (See our 2022 Outlook for our investment and thematic ideas). That said, rebalancing back to target allocations based on risk tolerance remains key.

On technical charts, the MSCI All Country World index's retreat from November's high of c. 760 indicates that the upward momentum has faded. The index has strong support at the October low of 702 (5.4% below Wednesday's close).
